Re: Funding for Counsel for Children in Supplemental Appropriations

We, the undersigned civil and human rights organizations, faith-based organizations, and direct legal services providers, strongly urge the Committee to provide robust support to guarantee legal services for children in any supplemental appropriations package. We are concerned that the administration has requested just $15 million to provide counsel to children, out of a $3.7 billion request to respond to the humanitarian crisis at the border. While we know the administration faced difficult choices in its supplemental request, this figure is wholly inadequate given how crucial counsel is to a meaningful immigration and asylum process.

Representation by counsel is absolutely necessary to help ensure that children receive full and fair adjudication of their cases. It is impossible for a child to competently represent himself or herself in immigration proceedings, which can be complex and arcane even for trained professionals. Many of the children arriving from Central America have been traumatized not only by violence in their home countries, but also by their difficult and dangerous journey to the United States. A report from the U.N. High Commissioner for Refugees suggested that 58 percent of the study's sample of more than 400 unaccompanied children "suffered or faced harms that indicated a potential or actual need for international protection," meaning that they may be refugees and could face serious harm, even death, if returned to their home countries. Yet without counsel, these children must put together complex claims for legal relief under U.S. law alone - violating the most basic notions of fairness.

Attorney General Eric Holder said, in testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee, that allowing the most vulnerable immigrants to appear in immigration court alone "is simply not who we are as a nation. It is not the way in which we do things." Former Assistant ICE Secretary Julie Myers Wood called the lack of legal representation for children under our current system "abominable." The United States should not allow children who have come to us seeking safety, and who may be eligible for U.S. protection, to appear in court without an attorney.

Legal representation not only helps to ensure that children receive a meaningful hearing, but also makes immigration proceedings more efficient.⁴ According to the National Association of Immigration Judges, "when noncitizens are represented by attorneys, Immigration Judges are able to conduct proceedings more expeditiously and resolves cases more quickly."⁵ Children with representation are more likely to appear for their court dates, and more likely to obey court orders, thereby alleviating pressures on the already hugely overburdened immigration courts.

No child should enter a courtroom without counsel. Any emergency supplemental appropriations package to address the crisis at the border must include sufficient funding to ensure legal representation for all children.
